Points of interest

Chalk is a very porous rock through which rain water sinks rapidly. This together with the thin soils generally make good dry walking conditions. The chalk is however a good aquifer, storing water in its lower layers which are underlain by a non-porous clay. There are many dew ponds (clay lines hollows) on the Wolds which were extensively used in times past to store water for farm and village use. Here at Settrington Beacon water is obtained from a borehole and stored in a service reservoir.

When you leave the wood look out for buzzards high in the sky overhead.
